Robot in Healthcare

There are several types of medical robots these days. They are changing the ways that doctors perform surgeries. They also help with keeping hospitals clean, making sure hospitals get the supplies they need and looking after patients. The first medical robots were robotic arms that assisted surgeons during operations.

Nowadays, robots do so much more. The Da Vinci robot helps surgeons perform minimally invasive surgeries. This means they do not cut through muscles and leave tiny scars. The MAKO robot specialises in assisting with surgeries for artificial knees. Other medical robots help people with disabilities. HAL (Hybrid Assistive Limb) is a robotic suit that helps people walk after an injury that has left them unable to move their arms, legs or spine. Hospital robots such as TUG help to deliver medicines and other materials around a hospital. It can find its way around using its built-in maps and sensors.

Moreover, it uses Wi-Fi to communicate with lifts, automatic doors and alarms. Another example of hospital robots is Xenex, currently used in over 1,000 hospitals. It cleans rooms, equipment and devices in under 20 minutes using Xenon light. Care robots or HSRs (Human Support Robots) help elderly and disabled patients to get in and out of bed or a wheelchair. Some remind patients when to take their medicine, and a few even provide support and act as a companion for lonely people.

There are likely to be more of these types of robots in the future. Care robots can also help nurses by taking over tasks such as taking patients' blood samples and temperatures and assisting patients in bathing. Thanks to these robots, nurses can spend their time giving more personalised care to patients. In short, robots are here to stay and they are making a big difference, especially in healthcare.

Read the following passage about Wildlife Conservation and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions.

Wildlife conservation is the practice of protecting wild species and their habitats to prevent biodiversity loss. Many species face extinction due to habitat destruction, environmental pollution, climate change, and illegal poaching. Conservation efforts include establishing protected areas, enforcing anti-poaching laws, and promoting sustainable development.

National parks and wildlife reserves provide safe environments for wild animals, allowing them to live and reproduce without human interference. Organizations such as the World Wildlife Fund (WWF) and the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN) play crucial roles in protecting endangered species. Local communities also play a role by practicing sustainable agriculture and reducing deforestation.

Despite these efforts, challenges remain. Climate change disrupts ecosystems, making it difficult for species to adapt. Moreover, illegal wildlife trade continues to threaten many animals. Addressing these issues requires international cooperation and long-term commitment. By taking action today, we can ensure that future generations inherit a planet rich in biodiversity.
